

Debt! Debt! Debt!

Since I started learning cello, I have stacked up far too many cello pieces debt. The pieces that I need to practice never got to the level of perfection that I wished. With full time teaching and administration job, training young teachers, quite a few servings at church, voluntarily jobs for some music organizations, playing cello at the Canterbury Philharmonic Orchestra, not to forget I am also a full time housewife.... I seemed to have ignored my weekly cello assignments!

I am a working mum trying to learn an instrument of my choice along with all my other commitments which are equally important to me. I am still trying to reduce my cello pieces debt by planning ahead, get organized and learning how not to procrastinate!

To all fellow little and not so little musicians, you are exactly in the same situation as me!

As a student (most of you), you have lots of other activities besides learning piano. You spend 6 hours at school every day; you might take up sports and other tuitions after school, you might be learning other instrument beside piano! Some of you that I know of are learning 3 instruments! Not to mention you still have school homework waiting for you every night! For those high school students preparing for NCEA examinations, your workload will be double or triple compared to others! Surprisingly, most of you still manage to spend hours and hours on social network (Facebook, etc...) !

If you have not yet learn the art of discipline, if you have not yet realized your parents are spending big money on your music tuitions, if you have not yet realized your own responsibility, and if you have not yet learnt to prioritize.... the consequence of your action will be the accumulation of piano pieces debt!

Would you like to be debt-free? I want to be debt-free on my cello pieces! If you like to work together with me, then we will learn how to be a better learner in the process of being debt-free! Trust me; you will gain so much more satisfaction and happiness in the journey of music learning by being debt-free.

Let's do it together!
